Questions on Shakespeare

By ALBERT H. TOLMAN

A Plan of Study Intended to Develop the Student's Personal Judgment on Shakespeare

PART I. - - - - - - Introduction
220 pages, 16mo, cloth; postpaid 81 cents

PART II. First Histories, Poems, and Comedies
364 pages, 16 mo, cloth; postpaid $1.09

THE author aims not only to make the study of Shakespeare in the classroom more uniform but to help private students as well, and to save even the occasional reader from a desultory and mechanical perusal of the text. Study clubs in particular will find that these questions answer their demand for a careful, systematic, and illuminating guide to the text. The exercises on each play follow a logical order, embracing general questions, questions on individual acts and scenes, character-study, the relation of the play to its sources, and questions concerning the text or meaning. Part I is introductory to the series. It includes "The Study of Shakespeare's Language," "The Study of Shakespeare's Verse," and a select general bibliography. In the first section the chief differences between the language of Shakespeare and present-day English are pointed out, and the reader is asked to find for himself good examples of each peculiarity indicated. Under "Versification" Professor Tolman traces the changes that appeared in Shakespeare's method of writing verse. The bibliography (in fifteen sections), gives convenient lists of books on sources, editions, historical data, interpretation, etc.

Part II contains detailed questions for the study of Shakespeare's four early histories (the three parts of Henry VI, and Richard III) which deal with the fall of Lancaster and the coming of Tudor; the early poems; and the first comedies, Love's Labour's Lost, The Comedy of Errors, The Two Gentlemen of Verona, and A Mid-summer Night's Dream.

> "I have had time only to look hastily through them, but no haste can countervail the manifest and manifold proofs of your unsparing labour and thorough scholarship. It is fairly astonishing what a deal of information in all departments of Shakespearian study you have compiled, and set forth alluringly—no small consideration where young people are concerned—within so small a space.
> "Happy the flock that can graze on the 'sustaining corn' which you have here provided for them."

> Editor of the New Variorum Shakespeare.
